COURSE DESCRIPTION

This three-credit intensive course examines negative attitudes—racism in particular—from a social psychological perspective situated within the historical and cultural context of South Africa. This location provides students with opportunities to learn about stereotypes, prejudice, and discrimination in a culture shaped by a long history of institutionalized racism. The experience of living within this culture and interacting with its people will allow students to gain a sense of the real effects of such attitudes.

The course will also examine the role that sports played in the transition from the apartheid government to the current democratic model—especially the 1995 Rugby World Cup Final played in Cape Town and won by South Africa. The course includes a service learning component (working with school children in an athletic role), cultural excursions, and safari in Kruger National Park. The program will allow time for training and workouts.
